This is a sample. Larkmoor Aesthetics, its website, Google listing and Instagram account are invented, and so is every quote. The problems in it are the ones I find most often on real UK clinic sites. A paid review looks the same, with live links and real screenshots.

JOHN PANTELO

John Pantelopoulos
john@jpaudits.co.uk
18 August 2026

Advertising review: Larkmoor Aesthetics

Checked on 14 August 2026: website (25 pages), Google Business Profile, Instagram bio, highlights and the last 30 posts.
Against: the UK's published guidance on advertising prescription-only medicines (POMs).

Dear Larkmoor team,

Thank you for sending your details. Your consultation process is sound: the booking page asks for a consultation before any prescription treatment and names your prescriber. The problem is the advertising around it. "Botox" is on your homepage, in your Google results, on Instagram and in a time-limited offer, so a patient can find the product name without looking for it.

I've listed 11 things below, in the order I'd tackle them. If you only have an hour this week, do 1, 2 and 4. The offers and the homepage are what a complaint would be built on. Items 5 to 8 can go in the same pass, and 9 to 11 can wait for your next site update.

Each item quotes what's there now and gives wording you can paste in. It's your decision what to change. This isn't legal advice and doesn't say you've broken the law. If anything's unclear, reply to this email and I'll explain.

John
John Pantelopoulos

The 11 items

Change first

1	The homepage names Botox, with a price and an offer	Website
2	Google shows a Botox price and offer	Google
3	A treatment page called "Botox Larkmoor"	Website
4	A pinned Instagram offer on Botox	Instagram

Same pass

5	Instagram bio names Botox	Instagram
6	A website testimonial names Botox	Website
7	Lip flip page implies a toxin	Website
8	Image alt text names Botox	Website

When convenient

9	Filler FAQ compares filler to Botox	Website
10	A Google Q&A reply gives a Botox price	Google
11	Price list linked from the main menu	Website

1 The homepage names Botox, with a price and an offer

Website · homepage banner and the "Popular treatments" tiles

The first line on your homepage is "Book your Botox and lip filler appointment today", and the first tile below it prices Botox from £160 with "smooth away lines in 15 minutes". The guidance says a named prescription-only medicine shouldn't appear on a homepage at all.[2, 3, 7] The price and the speed claim make the tile read as promotion. You can keep the 20% new-client offer, as long as it covers non-prescription treatments only.

Now

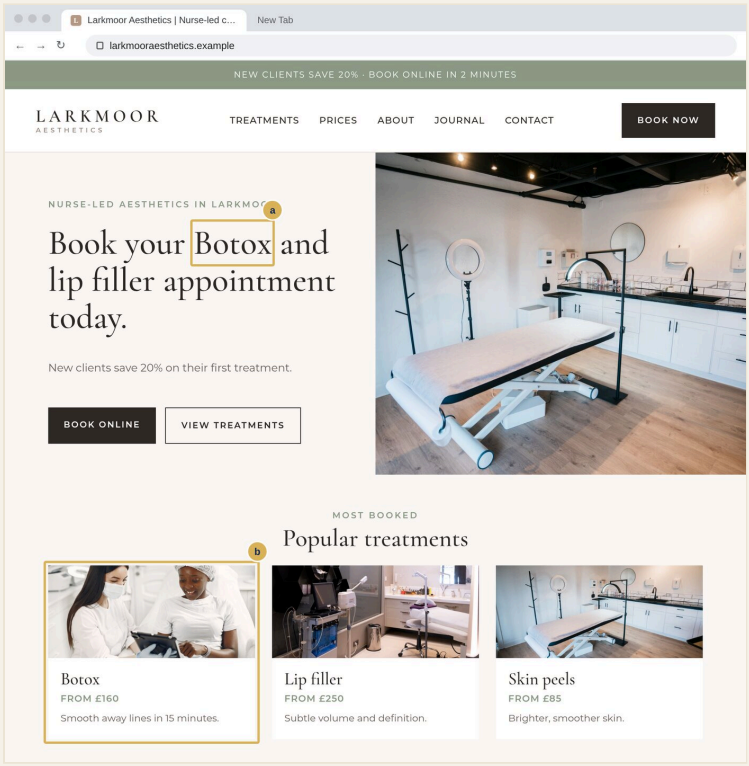

"Book your ~~Botox~~ and lip filler appointment today. New clients save 20%."

"~~Botox~~ from £160: smooth away lines in 15 minutes."

Suggested

> "Book a consultation for lip fillers, skin treatments, or lines and wrinkles. New clients save 20% on skin and filler treatments."

> Tile: "Lines and wrinkles: talk to our nurse prescriber about the options that suit your face. Consultation £30."

a Product name in the first line of the page.

b Product name, price and a result claim, together.

Mock-up: the clinic is fictional. In a paid review this is a screenshot of your own page, taken on the capture date.

2 Google shows a Botox price and offer before anyone opens your site

Google Business Profile · a service, a post from 2 August, and the search snippet for /prices/

Your listing reaches people who never visit the website, so it's held to the same rules. Right now a search for "aesthetics clinic larkmoor" shows a Botox price in the snippet, a Botox service with a price, and an August offer post. Offers on the price of a medicine are the clearest problem in this review.[1, 5, 7]

Now

Service: "~~Botox: 1 area~~ £160"

Post: "~~Baby Botox~~ August offer, just £130 this month only"

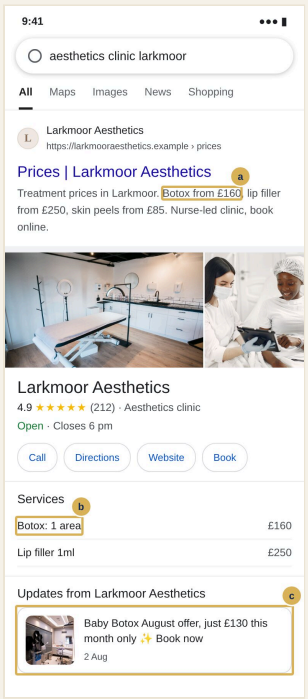

Snippet: "Treatment prices in Larkmoor. ~~Botox from £160~~, lip filler from £250…"

Suggested

> Service: "Consultation for lines and wrinkles: £30, redeemable against treatment"

> Post: delete it. If you replace it, promote the consultation, not a product or a price.

> Snippet: "Treatment prices in Larkmoor. Lip filler from £250, skin peels from £85, consultations from £30. Nurse prescriber led."

- a Snippet comes from the /prices/ meta description. You control it.
- b Service name and price.
- c Time-limited offer on a medicine.

Mock-up of a phone search for the fictional clinic.

3 A treatment page called "Botox Larkmoor"

Website · /botox-larkmoor/, linked from the main menu, 19 mentions of "Botox"

This page is the closest match to an ASA ruling I've seen on a clinic site: a page titled "Best Botox in London" that kept naming the product was found to promote it to the public.[4] Prices next to "anti-wrinkle injections" count as an ad for the medicine too.[5] I'd turn it into a consultation page and move the prices to the plain price list (item 11).

Now

Title: "~~Botox Larkmoor~~ | Best Anti-Wrinkle Injections"

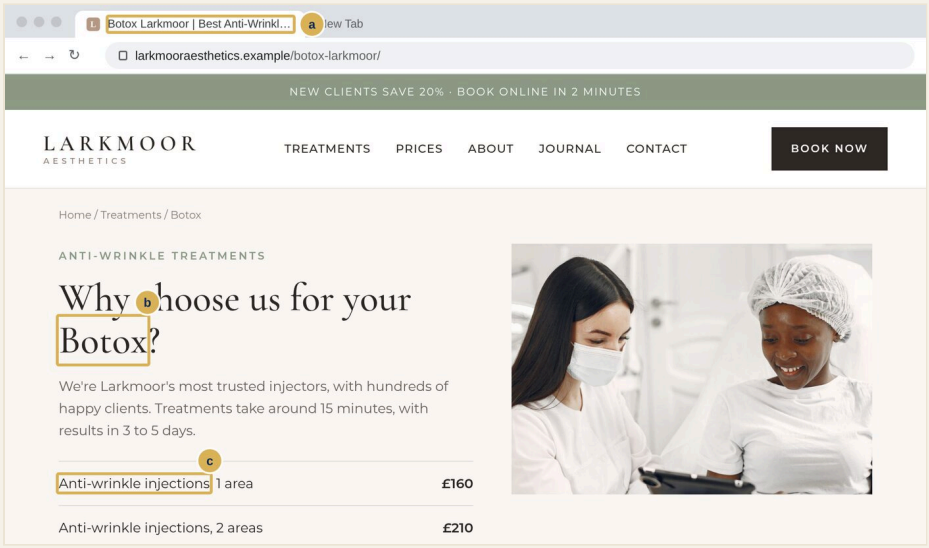

"Why choose us for your ~~Botox~~? We're Larkmoor's most trusted injectors."

Suggested

> Title: "Lines and Wrinkles Consultation Larkmoor | Nurse Prescriber"

> "If a prescription treatment is suitable, your prescriber will explain it, including risks and alternatives."

> New address /lines-and-wrinkles/, with a 301 redirect from the old one so links and search results still work.

a Product name in the page title, which is also what Google shows. The address repeats it.

b Product name in the main heading.

c Prices beside "anti-wrinkle injections".

Mock-up of the fictional clinic's treatment page.

4 A pinned Instagram offer on Botox

Instagram · carousel post from 9 August, pinned to the top of the grid

Posts and captions are ads under the ASA's rules, and this one is an offer on a medicine.[1, 7] Even without the word, a syringe emoji next to a price can point to the product.[5] Unpin and archive it, and take the product-name hashtags off this and older posts.

Now

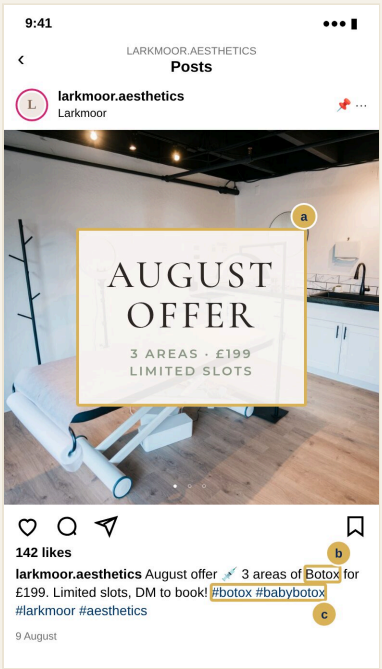

"August offer 💉 3 areas of ~~Botox~~ for £199. Limited slots, DM to book!"

Hashtags: ~~#botox #babybotox~~ #larkmoor #aesthetics

Suggested

> "Thinking about lines and wrinkles? Book a consultation with our nurse prescriber to talk through your options. Link in bio."

> Hashtags: #larkmoor #aestheticsclinic #skinconsultation

- a Price and offer on the image itself.
- b Product name in the caption.
- c Product-name hashtags.

Mock-up of the fictional clinic's post.

5 Instagram bio names Botox

Instagram · profile bio

The bio is the first thing on your profile, so it's held to the same rule as a homepage.[1, 3] It's a one-word change.

Now

"~~Botox~~ • Fillers • Skin | Larkmoor"

Suggested

> "Fillers • Skin • Consultations | Nurse prescriber led | Larkmoor"

6 A website testimonial names Botox

Website · /reviews/

The ASA names testimonials as a place a POM shouldn't appear.[3] Don't edit a patient's words. Take this quote off the website and pick one that doesn't name a product. The original can stay on Google.

Now

"Best ~~Botox~~ I've ever had, so natural!"

Suggested

> Remove from the website. Replace with another review.

7 Lip flip page implies a toxin

Website · /lip-flip/

"Lip flip" can only mean a toxin treatment, and the ASA says "relaxing" is read as a reference to Botox.[5, 6] I'd fold this page into the lip filler page and say other options are discussed at consultation.

Now

"A tiny dose ~~relaxes~~ the muscle so your lip rolls out"

Suggested

> "Other options for the shape of your lips are discussed at consultation."

8 Image alt text names Botox

Website · 6 before-and-after images

Alt text and file names show up in Google Images and screen readers, and the ASA lists hover text as a place POMs shouldn't appear.[3]

Now

alt="~~Botox before and after~~ forehead"

Suggested

> alt="Forehead, before and after treatment". Rename files such as botox-ba-1.jpg too.

9 Filler FAQ compares filler to Botox

Website · /dermal-fillers/, FAQ

Lower risk, because it sits on a filler page and answers a real question. It still names the product for no reason.

Now

"Is filler the same as ~~Botox~~?"

Suggested

> "Is filler the same as other injectable treatments? No. Your prescriber will explain the difference at consultation."

10 A Google Q&A reply gives a Botox price

Google Business Profile · questions and answers

You can't stop people asking, but your reply is your advertising. Keep the answer to the consultation.

Now

Q: "Do you do Botox?" Reply: "~~Yes, from £160!~~"

Suggested

> "Yes, we offer consultations for lines and wrinkles with our nurse prescriber. Prices are given at consultation."

11 Price list linked from the main menu

Website · /prices/

A plain price list is allowed, as long as it's informational and not easy to stumble on.[2] A menu link on every page makes it easy. Link to it from the consultation page instead, and keep the wording plain.

Now

Main menu → "~~Anti-wrinkle~~, 1 area £160"

Suggested

> "Prescription treatment for lines, 1 area £160", with no claims, linked from the consultation page.

What's already fine

- The booking page asks for a consultation before any prescription treatment, and names the prescriber.
- The "Is it safe?" page says botulinum toxin is a prescription-only medicine. That's safety information, not promotion.
- Skin, filler and peel pages don't mention any POM.

What I didn't check

- Paid ads (Google Ads, Meta ads), printed leaflets and signs in the clinic.
- Instagram stories older than 24 hours, and posts older than the last 30.
- Claims about treatments that aren't POMs, such as filler results.

Sources

1 CAP Code, rule 12.12
"Prescription-only medicines or prescription-only medical treatments may not be advertised to the public."

2 CAP Bitesize: Rules for advertising Botox
"A consumer casually browsing your site should not be able to find any reference to Botox easily."

3 ASA Advice Online: botulinum toxin products
"No reference to a POM should be made in a sponsored ad, on the homepage of a website, in logos, testimonials or hover text."

4 ASA ruling: Glowery Ltd, 2023
A page "titled 'Best Botox in London'" that "repeatedly referenced Botox" "promoted Botox to the general public".

5 ASA Enforcement Notice, 2020
"Anti-wrinkle injections" next to a price for a POM "will be seen as an ad for that POM".

6 ASA FAQs, 2020
"The word 'relaxing' is likely to be understood as an implied reference to Botox."

7 MHRA Blue Guide, Appendix 6
The home page "should not include any reference to named POMs". "Special offers on prices of medicines should not be highlighted."

John Pantelopoulos · john@jpaudits.co.uk

Questions about this report are answered by email at no extra cost.